

School Education – Improvement or Paradigm Shift?

The globalisation of the economy has seen rapid shifts in patterns of employment, most strongly apparent in those advanced economies which have been heavily reliant on manufacturing. Two schools of thought are developing – one school supporting the notion that traditional schooling, more effectively “taught”, will enable all students to thrive while others contend that only a radical change in pedagogy and related practices can provide an education which will achieve that result in this “new world”. This seminar will canvass a range of questions and answers related to this current dichotomy.
